This document is in two sections. First are the "white" cards, which are the responses/answers. We had the best results printing these on "whitish" card stock and cutting them out by hand.

The second section contains the "black" cards, which are the questions/prompts. I opted not to do these as white-on-black to save time and ink. Instead, we printed them on a yellow card stock and it worked just fine.

About these cards:

I created this deck as a custom game to play at my son's 9th birthday party. I felt like he and his friends (and the adults) would enjoy the core mechanic of Cards Against Humanity, but of course there's no way we'd expose our youngsters to the vile things in the original game. And while a lot of people recommended Apples to Apples as an alternative, it really isn't the same mechanic. So I decided on making a custom CAH deck that retains the naughty nature of the original, but toned down to a mostly-appropriate-for-the-single-digit-age-group level. I also wanted to focus on situations, words, and references that would tickle my kids' funnybones.

The game seemed to be a hit at the birthday party, so I decided to collect and organize these into a single package that others like you can print and play with their own friends and families.

So I hope you have fun with these, and let me know if you decide to expand on them. Oh, and of course a huge thanks to the person who runs biggerblackercards.com -- it's a super-easy site for creating PDFs of custom CAH cards, and is the tool that made this deck possible.

Enjoy!

"Black" cards are on the following pages.

To avoid having to use a bunch of ink printing black backgrounds, I made these black-on-white, the same as the "white" cards. I recommend printing them on a different color paper to easily tell them apart.

We used a nice yellow cardstock and the text stood out perfectly.
